What's So Special About Human Dignity? (DRAFT)

This article argues that human dignity is a normative concept closely tied to concerns about humiliation or degradation. It challenges common understandings of human dignity as (i) a brute indicator of moral status, and (ii) as a vehicle for concerns about autonomy.

On Falling Short (DRAFT)

Many of us should do more – that is, more than we currently do – for others. We know we are morally imperfect. And yet many of us make no effort to change. Is it ever right to accept our own moral badness? Or is that an inherently irrational, even dangerous idea?

When Less is More? Minimalism and Determinacy in Human Rights (DRAFT)

Co-authored with Robert Mark Simpson (Philosophy, Monash University).

This article evaluates whether so-called “minimalist” theories of human rights, which focus only on the most essential human goods (e.g., a minimally decent life) have the virtue of issuing more determinate verdicts about the validity of human rights claims.

Moral Minima (Under Preparation)

This paper sheds light on the idea of a “moral minimum” – a set of moral requirements of primary importance, and associated with special taboo. The article distinguishes between various forms of “moral minimalism,” and examines their difficulties and attractions.

Human Rights, Human Dignity, and Tuberculosis (DRAFT)

Co-authored with Brian Citro (Law, University of Chicago).

This article explores some of the dignity-related implications of healthcare laws and policies as they apply to victims of Tuberculosis, particularly in the Indian context.
